What leads a lot of folks to misdiagnose a blown head gasket on their 2.4L Nissan Frontier (Altima or Xterra), is that they pulled out the engine oil dipstick and saw that the engine oil WASN'T mixed with coolant. In other words, the oil was not a milky white color (as will happen in the majority of blown head gasket cases).

One more thing on the blown head gasket. The reason he probably has a blown head gasket is the heat I mentioned earlier. The heads (plural since both exhausts smoking) may be warped from heat and won't seal. Boost by itself won't blow the HG. I run 18psi on a regular basis, but have the proper setup.

If the rpms are changing going down the highway, it's the transmission. It could well be normal operation. I just got a 97 Civic with an auto and was scared to death that the tranny was about to blow up, as the rpms were not at all stable, even on the interstate. Seemed like the tranny was slipping something terrible.
